BACK CORBYN’S CAMPAIGN
FIGHT FOR WORKING-CLASS POLITICS

I DON'T AGREE WITH AUSTERITY
I OPPOSE ATTACKS ON THE WORKING CLASS AND THE POOR!

AT LAST!!
GOO'D LUCK JEREMY!
TELL 'EM JEREMY!

HE'S TEARING THE PARTY APART!!!
A DISASTER!!!

HE'S AN EXTREMIST!!
A MIGHTY INFLTRATOR!!

THE SOCIALIST WHO STOOD IN A LABOUR LEADERSHIP ELECTION

THE FAKE PRESS

HE'S SPEAKING FOR US, I'M GOING TO JOIN.

BALANCED MEDIA

THE FACE PRESS

• TAX THE RICH • EXPROPRIATE THE BANKS
What is the Alliance for Workers’ Liberty?

Today one class, the working class, lives by selling its labour power to another, the capitalist class, which owns the means of production. Society is shaped by the capitalists’ relentless drive to increase their wealth. Capitalism causes poverty, unemployment, the blighting of lives by overwork, imperialism, the destruction of the environment and much else.

Against the accumulated wealth and power of the capitalists, the working class has one weapon: solidarity.

The Alliance for Workers’ Liberty aims to build solidarity through struggle so that the working class can overthrow capitalism. We want socialist revolution: collective ownership of industry and services, workers’ control and a democracy much fuller than the present system, with elected representatives recallable at any time and an end to bureaucrats’ and managers’ privileges.

We fight for the labour movement to break with “social partnership” and assert working-class interests militantly against the bosses. Our priority is to work in the workplaces and trade unions, supporting workers’ struggles, producing workplace bulletins, helping organise rank-and-file groups.

We are also active among students and in many campaigns and alliances.

We stand for:
- Independent working-class representation in politics.
- A workers’ government, based on and accountable to the labour movement.
- A workers’ charter of trade union rights — to organise, to strike, to picket effectively, and to take solidarity action.
- Taxation of the rich to fund decent public services, homes, education and care for all.
- A workers’ movement that fights all forms of oppression. Full equality for women and social provision to free women from the burden of housework. Free abortion on request. Full equality for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people. Black and white workers’ unity against racism.
- Open borders.
- Solidarity against global capital — workers everywhere have more in common with each other than with their capitalist or Stalinist rulers.
- Democracy at every level of society, from the smallest workplace or community to global social organisation.
- Working-class solidarity in international politics: equal rights for all nations, against imperialists and predators big and small.
- Maximum left unity in action, and openness in debate.

If you agree with us, please take some copies of Solidarity to sell — and join us!

Contact us:
- 020 7394 8923 • solidarity@workersliberty.org

The editor (Cathy Nugent), 20e Tower Workshops, Riley Road, London, SE1 3DG.

Printed by Trinity Mirror

Get Solidarity every week!
- Trial sub, 6 issues £5 □
- 22 issues (six months). £18 waged □
- £9 unwaged □
- 44 issues (year). £35 waged □
- £17 unwaged □
- European rate: 28 euros (22 issues) □
- or 50 euros (44 issues) □

Tick as appropriate above and send your money to:
20e Tower Workshops, Riley Road, London, SE1 3DG
Cheques (£) to “AWL”.
Or make £ and euro payments at workersliberty.org/sub.

Name ..............................................................
Address ...........................................................

I enclose £ ..........................................................

Tories lie about 24/7 NHS

By Connor Peters

The new Tory government has wasted little time in stepping up its attacks on the NHS.

Jeremy Hunt (Secretary of State for Health) has announced plans for a 24/7 NHS and all-out war on hospital closures. This prompted a furious backlash from doctors across the country. And the hashtag #iminworkjeremy is reminding Mr Hunt that he already oversees a comprehensive 24-hour, 7-day week National Health Service.

The backdrop to this latest fight between the government and NHS workers is the recent recommendations by the Doctors and Dentists Pay Review Board. The British Medical Association walked away from discussions with the government over the renegotiation of doctors contracts last year.

The recommendations were meant to be a negotiating point between the position of the BMA and that of the government. However they have some clear flaws and have been used by the Secretary of State to position himself as the patient champion against nasty workforce consultants.

The reality couldn’t be further from the truth.

The recommendations are particularly damaging for training doctors, effectively removing them from the protection of the European working time directive, which prevents junior doctors working 101 plus hours a week, as used to be the case. The “regular working day” would become 7am to 10pm, Monday to Saturday. The amount of holiday is also to be reduced.

A group of young doctors walking zombie-like around the hospital are not going to be in a position to make good clinical judgements; patient care will suffer.

Non-emergency surgery doesn’t always take place over the weekend for the very good reason that tired doctors perform surgery they make more mistakes!

Jeremy Hunt seems determined not just to go to war with doctors but with all the statistics that prove he wrong as well.

There is an underlying hypocrisy to the whole saga. At the same time that the Secretary of State for Health is claiming to fight the good fight against doctors, he is demanding that £20 billion of savings are made, pilots of seven day GP services are ending because they are too expensive, don’t reduce demand on A&E and patients don’t turn up for appointments on Sundays!

There will be no more staff, no more resources and no more money under a Tory government.

Everyone who works in the NHS wants good quality, effective care, especially at weekends. This is why Jeremy Hunt’s claim has caused so much anger.

The focus of his demands — that more consultants be available — shows the elitism at the heart of the conservative project. No mention of the porters, cleaners, ward clerks, healthcare assistants, nurses, physios, occupational therapists, laboratory staff, radiographers, catering staff and everyone else that make a hospital run smoothly.

Underneath it all is a desire to undermine NHS services. The NHS exists despite our current neo-liberal capitalist economy. For over 60 years it has been a shining example of how solidarity and equality can make our lives healthier.

The Health and Social Care Act (2012) created a legislative framework for dismantling the NHS. Now attacks are focused on workers pay and conditions; it’s all about making the service more attractive to private providers. The next stage will be the reduction of free at the point of use care, and the introduction of co-payments and an insurance model.

In a little noticed move on the 9 July the Under Secretary for NHS Productivity announced to the House of Lords an independent inquiry into the funding model of our NHS. If the government has its way it will strip our NHS bare and then throw the scraps to its friends in the private sector, safe in the knowledge that those who can afford to pay will be okay.

A Twitter campaign has shown the strength of feeling within the health service, but it is not really enough on its own.

Concerted, coordinated action from the trade union movement is what is needed. And the people tweeting #iminworkjeremy are those.

Fence Sitter

They’re cutting help to those in need —
What case to vote against?

This is a tricky one indeed
I’m staying on the fence

Scrap targets for child poverty?

My mind is wracked with doubt

Perhaps, no — probably —
I’m sitting this one out

What’s wrong with capping benefits?

Could someone please explain?

There’s good things, bad things — call it quits

I think I’ll just abstain

Yes, voting No to welfare cuts

Would lead to Labour losing!

So we must show no heart or guts —

My, this is so confusing!

It’s been explained to me at last

The logic’s mighty fine

To be against, we let it pass —
I’m going to toe the line

Looking the other way. Three out of four Labour leadership candidates abstained on cuts to tax credits. Only Corbyn voted against

The fallout for a hungry kid?
Now that just leaves me cold

What impact on my Leader’s bid?

I think I’ll just abstain

The Whip’s my master and my guide

Abstention’s our position

Perhaps, no — maybe, probably —

I’m sitting this one out

My mind is wracked with doubt
Cameron’s hypocrisy on extremism

By Pat Murphy

On 20 July 2012 David Cameron spoke to a selected audience at an academy school in Birmingham about tackling violent extremism in Britain. While there were fleeting references to the far right and Islamophobia, the main focus of his speech was the extremism that led, among other things, to hundreds of young people leaving their homes in Britain to join Daesh (Islamic State). The speech was fundamentally about Islamist extremism.

Cameron’s approach to tackling extremism was, as he claimed, based on four central principles. His government would confront the ideology, tackle non-violent as well as violent extremism, empower reforming and moderate Muslims and build a more cohesive society.

Confronting the ideology means challenging the mythologies perpetuated by extreme Islamists (whether violent or not). For instance, the idea that western foreign policy amounts to a war on Islam or that there is a Jewish/Zionist conspiracy against Muslims.

It was while talking about this first principle, however, that Cameron raised the need to champion what he called “alternative values”, defining them as free speech, freedom of the sexual and other equalities.

But his commitment to free speech as a value seemed to be in tension with the determination to tackle non-violent extremism (“groups that may not advocate violence but which promote other parts of the extremist narrative”).

To embolden the moderates he promised to work with those within Muslim communities who wanted to promote a mainstream, tolerant, liberal narrative. On building a more cohesive society, the Tory leader promised actions to boost employment opportunities, especially for women and support for learning English.

How any of this would be done was left unexplained except for a vague commitment to avoid the mistakes of the past when “funding was simply handed over to self-appointed community leaders who sometimes used the money in divisive ways”.

The initial reaction to Cameron’s speech was fairly predictable. And a speech that contributed most to this debate is that they emerge from their own preconceived ideas and prejudices. Hence a lot of the hostile reaction didn’t engage with the speech at all, preferring simply to recycle generic responses to any attempt to critique Islamic terrorism.

The “root causes” brigade put forward once again the idea that the Iraq War explained jihadism.

A number of Muslim commentators accused Cameron of stigmatising their religion and thereby adding to the threat of alienation and radicalisation.

Clare Fox of the Institute of Ideas (descended from a weird sect, the Revolutionary Communist Party) complained that Cameron was allowing the terrorists to win by threatening free speech on campuses.

Cameron suggested colleges ban extremist speakers.

There is something to be said for all these reactions but, for the most part, they are beside the point. The central atrocity in modern jihadism, 9/11, predates Afghanistan and Iraq. And of the millions of people vehemently opposed those wars, all but a tiny handful have managed to avoid the impulse to murder innocent fellow humans.

Cameron was actually careful to distinguish between the extremists and mainstream Islam (“it cannot be said clearly enough: this extremist ideology is not true Islam. I have said it myself many, many times, and it’s absolutely right to do so. And I’ll say it again today”). And he at no point called for the banning of non-violent extremist speakers.

The comparison he made was with Holocaust denier David Irving. When he is invited to speak at university campuses, said Cameron, “they (the university authorities) don’t deny his right to speak but they do challenge what he says”. The implication being that we need a more robust approach to these people, seeing them as morally and politically analogous to the far right and denouncing them.

Even if it is Cameron saying it, this appears to me to be entirely right.

So the well-rehearsed reactions to Cameron miss the real problem with his speech and his approach, which is its hypocrisy and lack of seriousness.

BUDGET

One week after the speech, for example, the Runnymede Trust reported that the first budget of the new Tory government would make millions of minority ethnic people poorer at a faster rate than their white counterparts.

The report also found that one of the worst affected groups would be British Muslims. There is not the slightest chance that the economic and social policies of Cameron’s government will “build a more cohesive society”.

Cameron says in his speech that “It cannot be right that people can grow up and go to school and hardly ever come into meaningful contact with people from other backgrounds and faiths”. Meanwhile his government continue with their obsessive promotion of free schools which has seen the number and proportion of religiously-controlled schools expand dramatically.

His promises to help women from minority communities to learn English must have teachers of English as a Second Language teaching their hair out. ESOL courses have seen the worst and deepest cuts in education spending. As has the whole adult and further education sector. The financial and ideological assault on local authorities undermines at a stroke any possibility of creating this more cohesive society Cameron cynically promises.

And the hypocrisy doesn’t stop with domestic policy in Cameron’s speeches on confronting ideology. Cameron promises to give a platform to “the UK’s Secular City” and “areas of [local] communities, so they can ... speak out against the car- ragen BSL is conducting in their communities”. Let alone a week later his government is supporting (or complicit in) the Turkish government’s illegal Prosecution of the very Kurds who are in the frontline of the fight against Daesh.

The results of this hypocrisy for Muslim communities will be bad. It is likely that if we fail to engage these communities, so they can speak out against the carragen BSL is conducting in their communities, they will continue. It is supporting (or complicit in) the Turkish government’s illegal Prosecution of the very Kurds who are in the frontline of the fight against Daesh.

The promised support and empowerment is unlikely to be delivered but the surveillance and repression will. The recent pattern of local agencies (schools, councils) overreacting under pressure to avoid the blame for the next atrocity will continue.

So the well-rehearsed reactions to Cameron miss the real problem with his speech and his approach, which is its hypocrisy and lack of seriousness.

Not “one nation”, but a very divided and unequal nation
The Bernie Sanders campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination is probably the most exciting development in US politics since the 1930s. And it's not a coincidence that both the resurgent left of that decade and the Sanders phenomenon have followed the spectacular economic crashes of 1929 and 2008.

The Sanders campaign is a phenomenon. He's not only rising rapidly in the polls, but he's also a clear threat to Hillary Clinton, but he's raising millions of dollars in small donations and filling arenas with supporters — including in some surprising places, like Phoenix, Arizona.

A self-described democratic socialist and a former member of the Young Peoples Socialist League (YPSL), Sanders was influenced by an early visit to a kibbutz in Israel in the 1960s, and by the model of Scandinavian social democracy. He's proposed a number of radical reforms that put him far to the left not only of any mainstream presidential candidate this year, but to the left of anyone in living memory.

There has not been a campaign like this since Norman Thomas led the Socialist Party to its second-best result ever in 1932, polling just under 900,000 votes. (The Communist organisation. And a presidential election campaign is not an organisation. And a presidential election campaign is not an organisation.)

What's happening in 2016? Sanders is running as a rabid liberal. Sanders is a socialist, and is running as an anti-establishment candidate, but to the left of anyone in living memory.

Even worse than Clinton is the example of John Edwards, who ran an unashamedly social democratic campaign in 2008, far to the left of both Clinton and Obama. Of the hundreds of thousands of people who signed up to support his agenda for change, there is nothing left at all. Bernie Sanders will understand all of this. On the wall of his office in the US Senate is a framed photo of the legendary American Socialist Eugene V. Debs. As Sanders knows, founded social organisation after another in his life, dealing with railway workers, and continuing with the Industrial Workers of the World and the Socialist Party.

That party did not flinch. Sanders is a socialist, and running as an anti-establishment candidate, but to the left of anyone in living memory.

He's proposed a number of radical reforms that put him far to the left not only of any mainstream presidential candidate this year, but to the left of anyone in living memory.

Bill Hunter 1920-2015

Bill Hunter died on 9 July. He was a leading member of the early British Trotskyist group, the Revolutionary Communist Party, later a member of the organisations led byerry Healy, but joining the faction which opposed and split from Healy in the 1980s. Sean Matgamna remembers Bill Hunter.

Insofar as it is possible to separate personal qualities from politics, Bill Hunter was a model revolutionary: selfless, dedicated, always striving to be “objective” — that is, not to let personal feelings intrude on political attitudes and decisions — willing to pay whatever personal price his politics demanded of him.

When I first encountered him, early in 1960, I thought he looked the part, with a long ascetic face (after a near-fatal car crash in 1962, his face had to be reconstructed), spare frame and his general air of driving political seriousness. Without these qualities no revolutionary organisation is possible. They are not enough, of course. Bill Hunter was a model revolutionary: selfless, dedicated, always striving to be “objective” —

Martin Thomas' criticisms of my review of Nicholas Carr’s book on automation (Solidarity 370) focus on two related issues: the deskilling effects of automation and my rejection of the full automation of safety-critical systems through e.g. driverless cars or pilotless planes. On deskilling, I think there is one misunderstanding and one difference.

Firstly, I do not “want to have all traditional skills kept in general use” indefinitively. I am not proposing we return to human control of all automated systems. But I do suggest that Martin as a maths teacher believes that his students should not know their times tables because they can now use a calculator. The point I — with Carr — was making is that automated devices that are easy to use lead quickly to the atrophying or loss of skills which may be important in everyday life, in certain necessarily skilled tasks or, at the most extreme point, in certain fundamental human functions and capacities.

Martin argues that new skills will replace old skills and that we should therefore not worry too much. This ignores that the shift may lead to the loss of valuable knowledge and experience that may be important in particular labour processes.

One example is the shift in control of industrial production processes such as the production of chemicals that results from computerisation. In place of hands-on physical control and direct knowledge of the process, the operator of a computerised process is seated in front of a screen in which the processes is represented symbolically through software. The operator is only able to interact at one or more remove from the real process and only by means of the tools the system demands. We need to consider whether to manipulate the representation on the screen, leading to a decline in skills associated with direct interaction. The operator becomes totally dependent on the software.

There are a lot of dangerous effects in human’s ability to control the automated task (and also on job satisfaction). It may be, as Martin writes, that most deaths in the US take place in private non-automated planes, but Carr describes several incidents in which hundreds of people died as a result of pilot errors.

Bill Hunter's self-portrait

Bill Hunter summed up his attitude. It was the right attitude.

The next issue of Solidarity will carry a longer obituary.
Back Corbyn, fight for working-class politics!

The huge support for Jeremy Corbyn’s campaign for Labour leader is a reminder that what seems like an overwhelmingly dominant right-wing “consensus” in bourgeois politics can be limited and unstable. It shows that large numbers of people, including working-class and young people, still want a politics that is different to, and to the left of, the consensus of neo-liberalism — that the “market” must rule, the welfare state must be pushed back and getting rich is the best thing to aspire to in life.

Workers’ Liberty supported the Corbyn campaign in many areas of the country, in the trade unions, the Labour Party, Young Labour and the student movement. We urge everyone who wants to strengthen the left to join the party or register as a supporter to vote for Corbyn, and fight to make the biggest possible progress for working-class and socialists politics. But Workers’ Liberty will also be arguing for a renewal of those politics.

CLASS
Some on the left — people who have been demoralised by the dominance of right-wing capitalist ideology, or grown up in a period when working-class struggle is of very strong or visible — have argued that a left politics based on class is either no longer viable or effective. That is wrong.

First of all, as far as the employers who rule our society are concerned, the class struggle has not disappeared. They are highly “class conscious”, acutely aware of their collective identity and interests, and organised to ensure working-class people are low paid or impoverished and that unions are seriously limited in their power to defend workers.

To counter this, the largest possible numbers of workers — teachers and train drivers, cleaners and social workers, factory and office workers, IT workers and childminders — must become class-conscious and organised too. That is how big changes, like workers’ rights, the welfare state and NHS, and even the vote, were won in the past; it is how progress can be made now and in the future.

Elemental conflict in the workplace between bosses and workers over wages, conditions, etc., helps drive the process of social progress, but the building of self-conscious working class political organisations is the only way to really make progress. And those organisations will not appear overnight, they will not get built unless left-wing people and socialists intervene to make it happen.

The idea that in the past all or most workers were automatically class conscious, and ready to build organisations for political change), but now that distinct working-class consciousness is no longer possible doesn’t add up. Throughout the history of capitalism the working class has always been divided along various lines and, at least to some degree, dominated by various bourgeois ideas. There have always been working-class Tories for instance. There have been ups and downs, steps forwards and steps backwards. The ebbs and flows were dependent on the state of working-class organisation, decisively political organisation.

Constituting the working class as a conscious, united force requires strong and consistent anti-capitalist political ideas and organisations.

The weakening of working-class consciousness today is a result of a vicious class political project by those with power and wealth, and the consequent defeats for the labour movement. Seriously reversing those defeats requires building up working-class political consciousness in the labour movement and the wider society. Success for the Corbyn campaign will give us all confidence. That’s good, but socialists should see the campaign as a fresh start, as a way to begin to renew socialist political ideas.

SOCIALISM
All this implies different politics from those argued by the mainstream of the Corbyn campaign.

Those politics are radical compared to the Labour right and Corbyn should be supported for taking a strong stand against cuts, for migrants’ rights, etc. There are more radical note in the campaign — a vision of a different society and how to get there — but this is submerged. Socialists need to turn up the volume.

If we don’t formulate and push the “big ideas” of socialism, in order to challenge the big ideas of the ruling class, ideas which are pushed non-stop, every day, we will not be as effective as we can be in immediate defensive struggles. Socialist ideas are necessary to develop working-class policies that have force and clarity.

To get the maximum impact in this campaign, we need to argue, as clearly and loudly as possible, for socialism as a society in which the exploiting class is abolished (as a class) and the means of producing wealth, the offices and factories and corporations, are owned collectively by the community and run for the common good.

EMERGENCY PLAN
Socialism will only become possible when a solid majority of the working class, and the people, are convinced of replacing capitalism and ready to make it happen.

A Labour government led by Jeremy Corbyn after the next election, say, could not implement socialism if it wanted to. What it could do is implement strong measures in the interests of the working class, measures to weaken the capitalists, shift the balance of power and help workers struggle. It could be, at least to some extent, a workers’ government.

The alternative to an Alexis Tsipras-style collapse, is moving boldly to implement an “emergency plan” of anti-capitalist measures in the interests of the majority, like:

• Scrapping all anti-trade union laws;
• Public ownership of the banks and heavy taxation of the rich;
• Stopping and reversing cuts, stopping and reversing privatisation, rebuilding public services;
• A decent wage or benefits for all, abolish poverty and attack inequality;
• Stopping deportation and detention of migrants, repealing anti-immigration laws;
• Public ownership of and investment in renewable energy, transport etc to tackle climate change.

Corbyn supporters should take up bold campaigns around these kinds of positive pro-working class measures, moving away from general “anti-austerity” agitation.

LABOUR PARTY DEMOCRACY
The call from right-wing Labour MP John Mann to suspend the leadership election in order to stop Corbyn is a reminder, if we needed it, of the New Labour machine’s total contempt for democracy.

Even if Corbyn is elected, such people will not hesitate to undermine party decisions and democracy (and the party’s electoral chances) in order to unfairly take back what they have lost in a democratic fight.

The left should campaign for a thoroughgoing democratization of party and labour movement structures, including making the nomination procedure for leadership elections more open, replacing Policy Forums by a genuinely sovereign decision-making conference, and making it much easier to replace councillors and MPs. We need to hold to account those who vote for cuts, who refuse to fight the Tories and who spit on the movement’s democracy — political representatives as well as union leaders.

At the same time we should demand more democracy in society. We want a democratic federal republic, with a re-empowered local government, more frequent elections, abolition of the House of Lords and the House of Lords.

Whether Corbyn wins or loses, all these struggles demand a renewed left, including in the Labour Party. If you are convinced by our arguments, work with and join Workers’ Liberty to help make that happen.

Help us raise £15,000!

Every year Workers’ Liberty organises a summer camp, four days socialising and learning about socialism in the beautiful yorkshire countryside.

This year’s summer camp takes place on the 20-23 August at Height Gate Farm, Hebden Bridge, West Yorkshire.

Learning about socialism does not have to mean sitting in stuffy university rooms. The left has long neglected the sort of “socialist infrastructure” of cultural and social events, film showings, support networks and outings practiced by the socialists on the late 19th century. Workers’ Liberty’s summer camp is an opportunity to get some “socialist culture”.

Putting on summer camp costs us money, to hire the barn, buy food and transport materials. You can help us put on the event by coming to the event and buying your ticket now. You can find out more information and buy tickets at workersliberty.org/summercAMP
What’s in the new Memorandum?

On 15 July Tsipras won a vote in the Greek parliament to approve his deal, a third Memorandum. Red Network, an alliance of socialist organisations that is a leading force in Syriza’s Left Platform, distributed this leaflet on the day of the parliamentary vote explaining what’s in the new Memorandum. The text was translated and published by the International Socialist Organisation, socialistworker.org.

“A LIST of atrocities.” That is how the German magazine Der Spiegel described the new agreement.

“This Tsipras submitted to ‘mental waterboarding’” read the headline of the Guardian. Tsipras was like “a beaten dog” in Brussels, according to Bloomberg. These are the comments inspired by a humiliating agreement of extreme social cruelty and colonialist character. It is telling that the measures that will be immediately submitted to parliament are not the entire Memorandum, but only a “down payment” in order to secure financing. The complete Memorandum will be agreed to in a new, exhausting and humiliating round of discussions, which will last up to a month!

What is included in the agreement?

1. The IMF does not leave. Greece is committed to ask for the “support” of the bloodthirsty organisation from March 2016 (when the current financing agreement with the IMF expires), in questions of supervision, as well as financing!

2. The base of the value-added sales tax is broadened in order to increase revenues, with food bought in restaurants transferred to the highest tax rate. The hated Unified Property Ownership Tax (ENFIA) remains in place for the entire duration of the program. It will amass revenues of 2.65 billion euros annually, according to the projections of the previous government, regardless of dwindling real estate values!

3. No more collective bargaining agreements. For those who don’t understand the formulation about conforming to “best practices and EU directives” as mentioned in the agreement, there is also the clear-cut formulation, “Labor market policies should not return to past policy settings which are not compatible with the goals of promoting sustainable and inclusive growth.” Massive layoffs are explicitly foreseen.

4. An “Armageddon” in the state pension system:
   - The Lofevros Act 3863/2010 reducing main pensions is fully implemented.
   - The zero-deficit clause is implemented, thus reducing auxiliary pensions. This applies proportionally for lump sum payments as well.
   - Strong disincentives regarding early retirement.
   - The Pensioners’ Social Solidarity Benefit (EKAS) is gradually abolished by 2019.
   - Minimum pensions are frozen at current levels until 2021.
   - With minimal exceptions, the retirement age ceiling is increased to 67 years by 2022, or to 62 years for those with 40 years of contributions to social security.
   - All retirees after June 30, 2015, will receive just the basic pension and the rest of it following the completion of their 67th year.
   - Implementation of commensurable measures that will compensate for the cost of court decisions that acquitted pensioners who filed against the constitutionality of laws from 2012 onwards.
   - Contribution by pensioners to health funds is increased from 4% to 6%, something also applicable to auxiliary pensions.
   - Abolition of all existing social resources.
   - Uniformity of various funds by the end of 2015 and functional unification by December 31, 2016.
   - Real estate property worth €50 billion will be transferred to TAIPED (Public Utilization Fund of Private Properties), which gains full autonomy from government interference. This property will be liquidated to pay back the debt and recapitalize the banks. By comparison, in current price estimates, half of the Peloponese [a large region of Greece] is estimated at €50 billion. Twenty-five billion will certainly be channelled towards debt repayments (it is, of course, doubtful that this figure can be amassed). It is a lie that this fund will function under exclusive Greek control; the fund “will be managed by the Greek authorities under the supervision of the relevant European institutions.”

5. All government involvement in running the banks is prohibited. Thus, the last instrument of some form of independence policy on the part of the public sector is forbidden. The banks will be recapitalized in order to hand them over to the private sector!

6. Forget the ADMIE (the Independent Power Transmission Operator). Electricity distribution is handed over to big capitalists, with all the consequences this entails for the energy security of the population, the quality of service and, most importantly, the price of electricity.

8. The activation of automatic mechanisms of public spending cuts are foreseen in case of deviation from goals regarding primary surpluses (everyone knows the goals are unrealistic, so new cuts—in pensions, wages, social welfare programs, etc.—should be considered inevitable).

9. Sunday is explicitly a working day from now on.

10. A “great success” in the agreement is the liberalisation of closed professions. The only ones mentioned are passenger and vehicle ferryboat services in order to allow the entry of foreign capital into Greek shipping.

11. What remains of popular and national sovereignty has vanished. A cynical passage in the agreement reads: “The government needs to consult and agree with the institutions on all draft legislation in relevant areas with adequate time before submitting it for public consultation or to parliament.”

12. Excluding the humanitarian crisis law, all other measures adopted by the government in the last five months must be revised. The re-hiring of the cleaners at the Ministry of Finance, ERT workers, school guards and other municipal workers are all up in the air.

13. The financing needs of the resulting bailout will approach €90 billion, according to the agreement. Indeed, what will be the ratio of debt to GDP, especially under a Syriza government?

14. If any part of the agreement does not proceed as expected, the fault will lie exclusively with Greece.

The agreement admits that there are concerns regarding the sustainability of Greek debt. But where does the problem with the debt lie? “This is due to the easing of austerity policies during the last twelve months, which resulted in the recent deterioration in the domestic macroeconomic and financial environment.” Subsequently, any “haircut” — that is, a restructuring and reduction — of notional debt is ruled out. Only longer grace and repayment periods are envisaged. The next generations are certain to be slaves in a future debt colony.

16. Investment package: This is not worth €35 billion, as supporters of the agreement have written boastfully. In the next five years, the European Commission, in tandem with the Greek authorities, will “mobilise” sums up to €35 billion (via different European programs) for investments. Even if some of this money is made available, we know where it will end up.

The agreement of Tsipras to put austerity measures to the Greek parliament caused outrage and dismay on the streets of Athens.

However speaking to people soon after the overwhelming “oxi” (no) to any acceptance of austerity measures, there was a general feeling approaching euphoria.

I was in Crete the week before Tsipras’s turn where there had been a huge “oxi” vote of about 70%. The “oxi” vote there, as elsewhere, defied an immense press campaign predicting impending doom. A taxi driver told me that he had stopped watching the TV news — “all they do is try to scare you” he said.

I talked to Eleutheria, a waitress who came from Athens and now lives in Crete. Her name in English means freedom and gives an idea of her political ancestry. She told me not only that everyone wants to remain in Europe but all the political parties, Pasok, New Democracy were now saying they wanted a better deal.

But there is something particularly surprising when you talked further with those who voted “oxi” who weren’t committed political activists. The vote had already become a huge act of national pride and there was tremendous pride not only in “oxi” but also in Tsipras.

Only a few days later things were to change dramatically as Tsipras achieved no concessions from the Troika and agreed to propose the extensive austerity plans to the Greek parliament.

DEAL

I arrived in Athens on Monday, 13 July, the day a deal was reached in negotiations with the Eurogroup.

Outrage was widespread but the predominant mood was one of despondency. On that night there was a demonstration in Syntagma square outside the Greek Parliament. It was quite small — probably less than three thousand. There was a wide spectrum of anti-austerity activists present, including Syriza members from the youth wing and the left of the Party. I spoke with a number of the youth wing — traditionally amongst the most critical of any concessions being made to austerity. But it was clear that there was considerable disorientation and understandable disillusionment amongst them.

It was not possible to get any of them to go on the record for an interview. Undoubtedly that was partly because they were all very busy but one key activist admitted to me that he really did not know what to say that was positive. I asked whether the Syriza organisation could be mobilized against any deal — but no, the general view was that Syriza’s workplace and geographical membership had not coalesced sufficiently for there to be any serious debate. The common view was that Syriza would fracture along pre-existing political alignments.

I also asked whether trade unions might be brought out in major strike action. Activists of the far left coalition, Antarsya, I spoke to, some close to the SWP’s Greek organisation SEK, were highly optimistic of a strike call that had been made by the public sector union ADEDY for the following Wednesday — the day that Tsipras’s austerity proposals were to be put to the Greek Parliament.

The Syriza youth activists scorned that optimism however. “There will be only 300 in the Square on the day” — one prominent Syriza youth activist said. The picture he painted was of a trade union movement still dominated by former Pasok activists where there was no organised anti-austerity movements amongst the rank and file.

STRIKE

Both the pessimistic estimation by activists of Syriza, as well as the optimistic one by Antarsya, about the Wednesday ADEDY strike action were exaggerated.

The strike that took place on Wednesday primarily affected the Metro rail system, although the shutdown was in no way total. Speaking to union organisers on the day, they admitted that it had been a difficult job getting their members out. No other union had organised action and it had been difficult to map out to their members where they would go from here. A union demonstration of several thousands took place during the middle of the day attracted the radical left but there were no radical Syriza contingents that I could identify.

A larger gathering and protest was planned for the evening as Tsipras’s proposals were to be put to Parliament. But again the surprising thing was the lack of the contingents from the left of Syriza.

Instead it was the radical left outside Syriza who largely congregated outside Parliament. Undoubtedly Syriza anti-austerity activists would have been busy lobbying Syriza parliamentarians but there seems to have been no attempt made to mobilise the hundreds of thousands who had celebrated the “oxi” vote only 12 nights previously. The reach of the Antarsya and anarchist activists who did congregate outside Parliament clearly did not go as far as being able to organise those hundreds of thousands.

DIVISION

The impression of division on the Greek left was further underlined that night by the KKE (the Greek Community Party).

At 8:20pm a very loud and large demonstration of the KKE and their associated PAME trade union fraction started to arrive in the square. Being somewhat naïve, I expressed my pleasure to some of those already in the Square at a seemingly unusual display of unity from the KKE — who have been highly sectarian and refused to even join the “oxi” campaign, calling instead for an abstention.

“They are laughing at us”, “They are contemptuous of us” I was told. And this wasn’t said by a young anarchist but by a non-organised Syriza supporter who told me how he had served in prison in the 90s for his political activism whilst in the army, and had been in the KKE. He told me that the KKE were as “blind and unthinking” as “a religious cult”.

True to his prediction, the 25,000 strong KKE march entered the bottom end of the square and then left it on the other side — not to be seen again. Throwing tens of thousands of what were essentially recruitment leaflets into the air and onto the floor — for that was their mission on the night.

The 30,000 or so remaining were eventually tear-gassed out of the square after Molotovs were thrown by anarchists at some banks. The anarchists are strong in comparison with the UK. After the Nazi occupation, the 46-49 Greek civil war and the military dictatorship of 67-74, awareness is strong amongst Greek workers that the battle against imperialism’s demands on Greece usually ends up with violent confrontation.

But what Greek workers need more than pitched battles with the police is debate, argument and mass organisation. The premature curtailment of the protest on that night was unfortunate — it led to a dispersal at the very time when people were joining the protest. The “oxi” vote and the huge demonstration showed the huge strengths of connecting around a struggle from a parliamentary government such as Syriza. The Greek workers need an anti-austerity left that knows how to build on the parliamentary struggles that Syriza has headed, that is capable of building in working class neighbourhoods and in workplaces.

The collapse of that battle in parliament, as well as the events in Syntagma Square outside, also show how being dependent upon the parliamentary struggle and not energetically enough connecting with or challenging it can allow a crucial moment of mass defiance to be lost.
Why we need the right to strike!

By Charlie McDonald

The Tories have wasted no time in turning their manifesto plan to further straighten the jackets and the union law. Individual union members will need to opt in to paying towards the political fund. Whilst not included in the Bill, it is likely that there will be an amendment proposed, and supported by the government, that says not only should union members indicate that they want to pay the levy but they can also nominate which party the funds go to. There is a real danger that unions will have to collect funds for the Tories or UKIP. This amendments is likely to come from the SNP (who want the money) with potential backing from the Greens.

In the long run unions could be discouraged from having political funds altogether. Unions will withdraw even further from the arena of politics.

The Right to Strike campaign has been formed by rank and file union members in branches. As well as campaigning against the changes we advocate positive rights for trade unionists such as workplace balloting, mass meetings, club meetings to decide on industrial action, to strike over “political issues” such as privatisation, the right to take solidarity action in support of other workers, and the right to take effective picketing action including picketing workplaces other than your own. All of this is currently illegal in the UK.

The labour movement is moving slowly on fighting the introduction of new laws, let alone actually fighting for a positive right to strike. The TUC has called a national lobby of Parliament on the third reading of the bill in November, but is currently ignoring calls for a national demonstration. Little action has been organised by the official labour movement.

At the most recent Right to Strike London mobilising meeting we decided to organise direct action. We will be targeting the Tory party and a raft of hateful anti-migrant legislation.

A socialist that helps the right and the far right in the UK will. Cameron will go, but not to be replaced by Jones and full employment, but by a new Euro-sceptic leader of the Tory party and a raft of hateful anti-migrant legislation.

A socialist that helps the right and the far right in the UK to win a victory simply shows how disorientated they are.

Workers’ Liberty is in favour of a united, federal Europe. Is Owen Jones? That’s not clear. Maybe he has some fantasy in his head; smash up this European unity now, to build some socialist unity in the future.

But Jones’ underlying idea is for an isolated little Britain. Jones tells us that EU membership “forbid[s] the sort of industrial activism needed to protect domestic industries.” And a left anti-EU campaign would “focus on building a new Britain, one of workers’ rights, a genuine living wage, public ownership, industrial activism and tax justice.”

Whether Jones likes it or not his argument will be heard by British workers in this way: if you vote to get out of the EU you can get jobs and better pay; some migrants in the UK might suffer, but we’d be OK.

Owen Jones’ framework is nationalist and misunderstands socialism. Our role is to defend workers’ jobs in the UK and across Europe — and the world — by advocating the class struggle and solidarity across borders. Our job has never been to “protect domestic industries.”

We are fighting for a new Europe, a workers’ Europe.
A hundred years ago, on 22 April, poison gas was first used in warfare. Though about 95% of casualties in World War One were caused by explosives, sickness and malnutrition, there is a peculiar horror associated with the use of chemical weapons. It is also true that, apart from isolated examples, World War One was the only instance of the systematic and widespread use of gases in war (see box on types of gases).

As early as 1854, the British Secretary for Science and Art, Lyon Playfair, suggested bombarding the Russians in Crimea with shells filled with cacodyl cyanide, an evil-smelling substance which vapourises easily.1 Containing arsenic and cyanide, it is extremely poisonous. It was rejected by the military as being equivalent to “poisoning the wells of the enemy.”2 Playfair thought this argument was ridiculous since armies were quite prepared to cut people to pieces with shrapnel. He thought poison gas was a more humane way of killing the enemy.3

By 1915, both sides had already used tear gases and irritants and, despite military objections and the banning of poison gas projectiles by the 1907 Hague Convention, both would soon use lethal gases. The Convention was circumvented by releasing these gases from cylinders (Fritz Haber’s idea) when the wind was right: soon it would simply be ignored.

The first was chlorine.4 Commonly used in weak solution as a disinfectant for drinking water and swimming baths, chlorine is a pale green gas with a choking odour. It is one of the most reactive elements, which is bad news if it comes in contact with living cells. It dissolves in their moisture, releasing acid and bleach.

These substances cause irritation in the eyes, throat and bronchi. Victims experience coughing, tightness of the chest, breathlessness, bronchitis, pulmonary oedema (lungs filling with liquid) and, in high enough concentrations, death.

The effects were terrifying and unprotected troops fled in panic. Wilfred Owen’s poem describes a soldier unable to put on his gas-mask in time during what seems to be a chlorine to be followed by an infantry attack. The local commander thought poison gas was a more humane weapon but immediately adopted it themselves. Their first use was in 1914 in the Battle of Loos and was a failure. 140 tons of gas were to be released from 5100 cylinders but a change of wind caused the clouds to be blown back to the British trenches. On top of this, the wrong keys were sent for some cylinders so they could not be opened. Retaliatory gunfire burst some of these, causing further British casualties.5

Chlorine’s effects could be quite easily mitigated by a simple wet cloth over the mouth since it is water-soluble. Urine-soaked cloths were even better since chlorine reacts with urea. Quite soon, primitive gas masks were issued and chemists responded by developing different gases.

The French chemist Victor Grignard developed phosgene, the second most used gas of the war. Also asphyxiating, but less detectable than chlorine, it had a delayed effect so that soldiers could continue to fight, rather limiting its value: only the next day would victims become unwell as their lungs stopped functioning. It was by far the most lethal gas, causing 85% of gas deaths. Gas masks were soon modified to protect against phosgene.

Improved gas masks led to a race to develop other gases that could penetrate or bypass these. The most unpleasant and feared was mustard gas, introduced by the Germans in mid-1917.

Mustard gas was not very effective despite its horrible action: it condensed into an oily liquid and polluted the area for weeks or months, keeping out both sides.

By 1918, all sides were using all gases to support offensive, in artillery shells rather than cylinders, but gas was still only responsible for a small percentage of deaths. There were about 25 million casualties from gas, of which fewer than 100,000 died. Most were able to fight again after a few weeks’ recovery.

Many survivors felt that their health had been permanently damaged but a study published in the BMJ in 20076 showed they were no less healthy or long-lived than other World War One soldiers. This “gas shock,” by analogy with “shell shock” first diagnosed in World War One, resembles the post-traumatic stress disorder described in US Vietnam veterans.

Gas was understandably more feared than its objective dangers justified; the crude gas masks also induced claustraphobia and panic. In addition, though terrifying and cruel, gas was just not very effective.

Notes
1 Discovered by Robert Bunsen (of Bunsen burner fame) who lost the sight of one eye when some escaped.
2 Discovering the property of venoms.
3 Element number 17, in Group 7 (halogens or “salt-makers”), chlorine atoms have seven electrons in their outer shell, one less than the noble gases. This makes chlorine very reactive. It attacks living cells, useful against bacteria but deadly when breathed by animals. It dissolves and reacts with water, producing hydrochloric acid (the cause of the strong smell of clouds). It is also a strong irritant to the skin and respiratory tract.
4 Fritz Haber, “father of industrial nitrogen fixation”, may be the most important chemist of all time. With Carl Bosch, he invented a method of making amonia from nitrogen and hydrogen, enabling Germany to make the explosives and fertilizers essential to be able to fight the war. Haber’s taste for mass killing in German laboratories allowed world agricultural productivity to soar, acting as the “detonator of the population explosion,” in which the world’s population increased fourfold in 100 years. Haber received the Chemistry Nobel in 1918.
5 Haber was a patriot who desired his country’s victory, and his process certainly prolonged the war. But he was keen to do more and, in December 1914, he suggested releasing clouds of chlorine gas from pressurised cylinders to drift over Allied trenches. Put in charge of organising the new munitions plant at Lytham, he hurried to the site and by 18 April, 5000 cylinders, each holding 35 litres of chlorine, had been dispatched to Ypres. The first use of chlorine was planned as a trial run, using 7000 cylinders with Fritz Haber as the second in command. By 1 May, the first chlorine cylinders arrived, but this was refused since this was merely a trial. Special pioneer units, including scientists, were needed for stability. This makes chlorine very reactive. It attacks living cells, useful against bacteria but deadly when breathed by animals. It dissolves and reacts with water, producing hydrochloric acid (the cause of the strong smell of clouds). It is also a strong irritant to the skin and respiratory tract.
6 Discovered by Robert Bunsen (of Bunsen burner fame) who lost the sight of one eye when some escaped.
7 Discovering the property of venoms.
8 Fritz Haber, “father of industrial nitrogen fixation”, may be the most important chemist of all time. With Carl Bosch, he invented a method of making amonia from nitrogen and hydrogen, enabling Germany to make the explosives and fertilizers essential to be able to fight the war. Haber’s taste for mass killing in German laboratories allowed world agricultural productivity to soar, acting as the “detonator of the population explosion,” in which the world’s population increased fourfold in 100 years. Haber received the Chemistry Nobel in 1918.

Continued on page 10
Neither “leaving” nor “reclaiming” Labour will do

By Daniel Randall

Two recent articles, by Michael Chessum in the New Statesman and by Ben Sellers on the blog Left Futures, ask the question: “Should socialists leave the Labour Party or ‘reclaim’ it?” Both articles are based on the idea that fundamental reason for so-called left-wing policy in CLPs and at Labour Party conference? The record also shows that we cannot hope to transform the Labour Party if we are not able to win backing for it across the unions — “reclaim Labour” or “leave Labour” are inadequate perspectives, answers to the wrong question, and neither of them quite possible in the way their proponents imagine. We cannot “reclaim” what was never straightforwardly “ours”, but conversely, while individuals can cancel their party membership, we should not simply “leave” Labour, in the sense of walking away from it, or bypass it, when the bulk of our movement is still essentially there.

Rather, we should aim to develop a campaign of working-class self-assertion on every front. The starting point for that is the rank-and-file push to make our unions fight, and the nascent left perspective is for the transformation of the whole movement.

Neither the Unite-led exodus from the Labour Party history nor the wake of the 2015 general election, Unite delegates on Labour’s National Policy Forum helped vote down policy that we’ve committed the Labour Party to an anti-austerity political platform. The recent record shows how naive it is to expect Unite to provide the impetus for an “English Syriza” (even if the Corbyn campaign shakes things up, and presently Unite are doing little to back up their formal support for Corbyn).

The campaign of someone genuinely of the radical left will sharpen the contradictions within Labour. But the leadership election isn’t the be-all and end-all, however it is decided. In his New Statesman article, Michael says the election might be the “beginning of the swan-song of the Labour left — another moment at which many of its number finally decide, from a position of strength, to start or join something new.” There is probably a widespread hope in some quarters that Corbyn’s (unsuccesful) campaign will finally make people realise there’s no point engaging with the Labour Party, and he and all his supporters will walk out of Labour to found a new party. But even in the unlikely event that this mechanical teleology becomes a reality, we’d still be faced with a fundamental roadblock: the question of organisation and politics in the whole labour movement. Could networks developed around the Corbyn campaign be the future infrastructure of the reinvigorated Labour left that is formed? Well, maybe. If Corbyn wins (and there is a case that is becoming less unlikely), the Labour Party will probably fracture, with hard-Blairites perhaps moving to overturn the coalition make it simply walking out of the party (maybe to fuse with the rump Lib Dems, their natural allies). That would take us into uncharted, difficult, and unpredictable territory, but would create immense possibilities too. The left will have the opportunity to directly navigate through that area, if we begin developing a more sophisticated perspective for winning genuine independent labour representation.

Workers’ Liberty has advocated the initiation of local labour movement conferences, organised through active union branches, or Trades Councils where they have life (and, maybe, in some places, by CLPs), to act as forums where these perspectives can be thrashed out. Whatever we do — within Labour and without, including the Corbyn campaign and the work we must all now put in to win backing for it across the unions — “reclaim Labour” or “leave Labour” are inadequate perspectives, answers to the wrong question, and neither of them quite possible in the way their proponents imagine. We cannot “reclaim” what was never straightforwardly “ours”, but conversely, while individuals can cancel their party membership, we should not simply “leave” Labour, in the sense of walking away from it, or bypass it, when the bulk of our movement is still essentially there.

Rather, we should aim to develop a campaign of working-class self-assertion on every front. The starting point for that is the rank-and-file push to make our unions fight, and the nascent left perspective is for the transformation of the whole movement.

Neither the Unite-led exodus from the Labour Party history nor the wake of the 2015 general election, Unite delegates on Labour’s National Policy Forum helped vote down policy that we’ve committed the Labour Party to an anti-austerity political platform. The record also shows that we cannot hope to transform the Labour Party if we are not able to win backing for it across the unions — “reclaim Labour” or “leave Labour” are inadequate perspectives, answers to the wrong question, and neither of them quite possible in the way their proponents imagine. We cannot “reclaim” what was never straightforwardly “ours”, but conversely, while individuals can cancel their party membership, we should not simply “leave” Labour, in the sense of walking away from it, or bypass it, when the bulk of our movement is still essentially there.

Rather, we should aim to develop a campaign of working-class self-assertion on every front. The starting point for that is the rank-and-file push to make our unions fight, and the nascent left perspective is for the transformation of the whole movement.

Neither the Unite-led exodus from the Labour Party history nor the wake of the 2015 general election, Unite delegates on Labour’s National Policy Forum helped vote down policy that we’ve committed the Labour Party to an anti-austerity political platform. The record also shows that we cannot hope to transform the Labour Party if we are not able to win backing for it across the unions — “reclaim Labour” or “leave Labour” are inadequate perspectives, answers to the wrong question, and neither of them quite possible in the way their proponents imagine. We cannot “reclaim” what was never straightforwardly “ours”, but conversely, while individuals can cancel their party membership, we should not simply “leave” Labour, in the sense of walking away from it, or bypass it, when the bulk of our movement is still essentially there.

Rather, we should aim to develop a campaign of working-class self-assertion on every front. The starting point for that is the rank-and-file push to make our unions fight, and the nascent left perspective is for the transformation of the whole movement.

Neither the Unite-led exodus from the Labour Party history nor the wake of the 2015 general election, Unite delegates on Labour’s National Policy Forum helped vote down policy that we’ve committed the Labour Party to an anti-austerity political platform. The record also shows that we cannot hope to transform the Labour Party if we are not able to win backing for it across the unions — “reclaim Labour” or “leave Labour” are inadequate perspectives, answers to the wrong question, and neither of them quite possible in the way their proponents imagine. We cannot “reclaim” what was never straightforwardly “ours”, but conversely, while individuals can cancel their party membership, we should not simply “leave” Labour, in the sense of walking away from it, or bypass it, when the bulk of our movement is still essentially there.

Rather, we should aim to develop a campaign of working-class self-assertion on every front. The starting point for that is the rank-and-file push to make our unions fight, and the nascent left perspective is for the transformation of the whole movement.

Neither the Unite-led exodus from the Labour Party history nor the wake of the 2015 general election, Unite delegates on Labour’s National Policy Forum helped vote down policy that we’ve committed the Labour Party to an anti-austerity political platform. The record also shows that we cannot hope to transform the Labour Party if we are not able to win backing for it across the unions — “reclaim Labour” or “leave Labour” are inadequate perspectives, answers to the wrong question, and neither of them quite possible in the way their proponents imagine. We cannot “reclaim” what was never straightforwardly “ours”, but conversely, while individuals can cancel their party membership, we should not simply “leave” Labour, in the sense of walking away from it, or bypass it, when the bulk of our movement is still essentially there.

Rather, we should aim to develop a campaign of working-class self-assertion on every front. The starting point for that is the rank-and-file push to make our unions fight, and the nascent left perspective is for the transformation of the whole movement.

Chemical warfare

concentration in a cloud over 6 feet (2 metres) deep covering an area of 10,000 square miles. With a density two-and-a-half times that of air, it would hug the ground and flow into trenches and under-ground bunkers.

4 Gas! Gas! Quick boys! — an ecstasy of fumbling. Fitting the clumsy helmets just in time, but somehow not quickly enough, therank and file cower and stumble along like drunkards.

5 And flound’ring like a man in fire or flame. Dim, through the misty panes and thick green light, Fitting the clumsy helmets just in time; But somebody still was alight behind, and all was darkness around me.” (Adolf Hitler, Mein Kampf).

6 Jaeger was exposed in 1932 by a French World War One general (2012) and the more extensive (2015, Royal Society of Chemistry) provided much information. 7 A living wall of green fog, about four feet in height, moved towards the French line and spread out to a width of about 180 metres. As the wall of smoke grew higher the whole area disappeared into it. Suddenly the rifle fire from the French increased, but gradually died down.

9 You couldn't make it up!

All-out strike at National Gallery

By Peggy Carter

PCS members fighting privatisation at the National Gallery voted on 24 July for all-out strike from the start of August if the gallery does not back down.

Workers have already struck for more than 50 days, as well as holding various stunts, parties and protests inside and outside the gallery.

Workers will strike again on Wednesday 29 July and are holding an “alternative leaving party” for outgoing gallery director on Thursday 30 July.

Sacked PCS rep Candy Udevin was due to have her appeal hearing with the gallery on 22 July, after being vindicated by a judge who said that a “tribunal would most likely not find her actions blame-worthy”, but the hearing was postponed as the gallery did not give her union adequate notice of a date.

Workers at other museums and galleries are getting organised. Workers at National Museums Wales strike on Saturday 1 August against plans to cut weekend working payments resulting in a 12-15% pay cut for front of house staff.

Defend Max, Natasha and Frank

Unison members at London Metropolitan university struck on Friday 24 July over the implementation of compulsory redundancies.

Unison and UCU have been fighting 165 job cuts at the university. However the university has gone ahead with a compulsory redundancies program and has started issuing notices to staff to be made redundant.

Unison branch secretary Max Watson is among those to have been notified of redundancy. Unison believes Max has been singled out due to his trade union activity and will be appealing the decision. Unison members Natasha Lalovic and Frank Duffy are also appealing their compulsory redundancies.

The strike on 24 July, following those on 4 and 25 June, will be combined with action short of strike action including an overtime ban, not working outside contracted hours, and not covering for leave sickness or training of colleagues.

Unison hopes that strikes in the middle of exam re-sits will show management that cuts will impact on the university’s ability to function.

• Sign the petition to defend Max — bit.ly/Defend-Max

Victory for pay regrading fight

By Anne Field

After 17-weeks of an all-out strike, preceded by several weeks of action short of strike action, Glasgow City Council Homelessness Caseworkers voted to return to work last week after their key demand had been met.

The caseworkers, members of Unison, have won their demand for regrading and are to be paid the same as other frontline social care staff, amounting to an immediate increase of around £1,000 a year, and an overall increase of £5,000 by 2018.

In a face-saving exercise by the Council — a continuation of its pretence that the caseworkers do not have a legitimate claim for regrading — caseworkers are to undergo an assessment process for the regraded posts.

Three temporary caseworkers are to be given higher-graded permanent posts elsewhere in the homelessness service. And some management posts are to be cut through voluntary early retirement.

At the start of the dispute Council officials and councillors refused to countenance the demand for regrading. For the first six weeks of the strike social work management did not even meet with the strikers.

After talks finally got under way, management effectively conceded the demand for regrading but proposed that a third of the posts be axed, so that the regrading would be self-financing.

While refusing to negotiate, social work management was willing to see support and provision for the city’s homeless collapse into chaos and virtual non-existence.

“The Sparks” protested outside the gallery on 22 July, after the gallery did not give her date.

Workers have already struck for more than 50 days, as well as holding various stunts, parties and protests inside and outside the gallery.

Workers will strike again on Wednesday 29 July and are holding an “alternative leaving party” for outgoing gallery director on Thursday 30 July.

Sacked PCS rep Candy Udevin was due to have her appeal hearing with the gallery on 22 July, after being vindicated by a judge who said that a “tribunal would most likely not find her actions blame-worthy”, but the hearing was postponed as the gallery did not give her union adequate notice of a date.

Workers at other museums and galleries are getting organised. Workers at National Museums Wales strike on Saturday 1 August against plans to cut weekend working payments resulting in a 12-15% pay cut for front of house staff.

Outsourcing protest wins

Unite rep for agency electrical contractors working on a site at Morgan Stanley Investment Bank in Canary Wharf, Graeme Boxhall, was sacked for demanding workers were directly employed by Phoenix Electrical rather than its subcontractor B&D.

Graeme was swiftly reinstated by the company after activists from Unite, the Blacklist Support Group, Teesside Construction Activists and rank-and-file site electricians network “The Sparks” protested outside Morgan Stanley.

Activists linked arms to picket the entrance to the site despite a high court injunction banning the protest and a heavy police presence, resulting in workers refusing to cross the picket line.

Activists say they will be back picketing if they do not receive “full capitulation and compliance with the Joint Industry Board conditions” which state all workers on site have the right to be directly employed.

More tube strikes on 5-6 August

By Ollie Moore

Tube unions accused London Underground of breaching safety standards in an ongoing dispute over pay, terms, and conditions.

With an overtime ban in place, LU has fallen behind on fleet maintenance schedules. Unions say it has put trains into service without preparation being carried out by properly qualified staff, and instructed their members not to drive inadequately-prepared trains.

The Office of Rail Regulation is investigating the claims.

In a move seen by many workers as an outrageous provocation, LU threatened to dock the pay of any driver who upheld their legal right to refuse to work if they were not satisfied that safety standards had been met.

The overtime ban has also led to temporary station closures at Old Street, Liverpool Street, and Walthamstow Central.

A strike by all four Tube unions is set to go ahead on 5-6 August. As LU prepares to introduce all-night running at weekends, unions are demanding a settlement that guarantees work/life balance and protects workers from the detrimental health impacts of prolonged night working and antisocial hours.

The rank-and-file bulletin Tubeworker, published by Workers’ Liberty, is arguing for the strikes to escalate beyond 24 hours following the next action.

Blacklisting protest wins

Unite rep for agency electrical contractors working on a site at Morgan Stanley Investment Bank in Canary Wharf, Graeme Boxhall, was sacked for demanding workers were directly employed by Phoenix Electrical rather than its subcontractor B&D.

Graeme was swiftly reinstated by the company after activists from Unite, the Blacklist Support Group, Teesside Constructions Activists and rank-and-file site electricians network “The Sparks” protested outside Morgan Stanley.

Activists linked arms to picket the entrance to the site despite a high court injunction banning the protest and a heavy police presence, resulting in workers refusing to cross the picket line.

Activists say they will be back picketing if they do not receive “full capitulation and compliance with the Joint Industry Board conditions” which state all workers on site have the right to be directly employed.
Turkey breaks ceasefire with PKK

By Simon Nelson

The bomb attack on the youth wing of the Socialist Party of the Oppressed, the SGDF, as their members travelled to Suruc on the Turkey-Syria border to help reconstruct Kobane, has provoked a wide-ranging response from the Turkish state.

According to official accounts the SGDF were attacked by a suicide bomber from Daesh (Islamic State), with over 30 of their members killed.

The SGDF is part of a coalition of groups with close links to the People’s Democratic Party. Press reports from across the region quote their members and supporters who are sceptical of the official claims and believe they were targeted by the Turkish state, for their support for Kurdish autonomy.

In response to the attack Turkey has launched “anti terrorism operations” in Northern Iraq. Quoted in the Guardian, the Turkish Prime Minister’s Office declared that “strikes were carried out on targets of the Daesh terrorist group in Syria and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers Party) terrorist group in northern Iraq,” adding that all anti-terrorism operations were “carried out indiscriminately against all terrorist groups”. This marks the effective end of the ceasefire with the PKK. The group responded by attacking a police convoy in Deyr alzor, southeastern Turkey. Although the PKK have not formally lifted their ceasefire it is now likely that their forces fighting Daesh across Rojava may now weaken, as sections resume fighting with the Turkish military.

ALLIES

Turkish fighter jets are also targeting Daesh positions in Syria where, with pressure from the US and other NATO members, the PYD forces are viewed as allies in the fight against Daesh.

Previous actions by Turkey against Daesh have not involved flying into Syrian airspace.

Turkey now claims to be committed to the fight against Daesh, whereas they had previously acted as a conduit for weapons and people attempting to cross into Daesh held territory.

Within Turkey itself the bombing of Suruc has instigated a crackdown on internal dissent with the state announcing that over the weekend 600 terrorism suspects were detained who had links with either Daesh and the PKK.

The subsequent level of tension in the largely Kurdish south-east of Turkey could easily provoke an escalation of PKK activity in the region. Protests that have occurred across Turkey against the Suruc bombing and state oppression have been met with water cannons and other repressive measures.

The People’s Democratic Party which operates legally in Turkey and has widespread support amongst Kurds as well as ethnic Turks said in a statement: “We underlie again how very much Turkey needs peace and a solution [to the Kurdish issue]. It is possible to solve our social, historical and political problems through mutual dialogue, negotiations and through the development of democracy. The increase and perpetuation of violence will not bring a lasting, democratic and egalitarian solution for anyone, or any part of society.”

Whilst no coalition can be formed following the most recent Turkish elections, the currently ruling AKP is likely to call new elections later this year. Their current strategy could seek to build an electoral victory on a wave of crackdowns within Turkey and an anti-Kurdish hostility.

Whether Turkey’s new found desire to attack not just the PKK but Daesh as well is a cynical electoral manoeuvre remains to be seen.

Fast track asylum detention unlawful

By Andy Forse

A judicial ruling last month forced the Government to suspend its system of fast tracking asylum seekers’ appeals.

This system leaves appellants in asylum cases detained and facing “kangaroo courts”, in a process deemed to be unlawful and ‘structurally unfair’ by the judge.

800 cases are to be reviewed, and 100 asylum seekers recently entered into the fast track detention system are to be released while this goes on.

Most of those in the fast track system are to remain in detention because they face imminent deportation.

The use of detained fast track has rapidly increased in recent years, and one in five appeals are heard through this system, which has a 99% rejection rate. Previously, charities have shown that the initial ruling on asylum cases is found wrong on appeal in 26% of cases. For women, this figure rises to 50%.

While the ruling is a positive step, the UK asylum system remains incredibly unjust and punitive — several detention centres are run for profit and investigations have revealed that reports of sexual abuse and harassment by guards are common, racism is rife; and detainees receive inadequate health care and poor accommodation.

There have been numerous acts of resistance by detainees in response to their poor treatment and conditions, such as the hunger strike earlier this year, which spread from Harmondsworth to Morton Hall.

The civil rights group “Movement for Justice by Any Means Necessary” have been organising demonstrations outside detention centres — the next one is on the 8 of August at Yarl’s Wood Immigration Removal Centre in Bedford.

Immigration and asylum are fundamentally class issues. Asylum seekers seek refuge from the war, torture and political repression that is instigated by capitalist states and anti-democratic regimes.

Socialists must build solidarity with all migrants and puncture the racist narratives of the elite who seek to turn workers against members of their own class.