Drive for Profit

Don't take chances!

The latest round of wage negotiations in the US has ended in a walkout by workers at the Chrysler plant in Detroit. The move comes after months of bitter fighting between the automaker and its trade unions over the future of the company. Chrysler is one of the biggest manufacturers of cars in the US and is facing intense competition from its European and Japanese rivals.

The company announced plans to cut thousands of jobs and to close several of its factories, leading to widespread protests from workers and union leaders. In response, the United Auto Workers union called for a strike, demanding better pay and working conditions for its members.

The strike began on Monday, and it is the first major industrial action in the US in recent years. Chrysler has announced that it will not pay any strike benefits to the workers and that it will continue to operate during the strike. The company has also threatened to shut down its factories in the US and move production to other countries.

The strike has sparked a wave of sympathy from other workers and union leaders across the US, who have called for support for the Chrysler workers. The union has also called for a national day of action to protest against the company's plans.

The strike is not expected to last long, as Chrysler is a major employer in the US and is facing intense pressure to reach a deal with the union.

Irena Holt reviews Black Paper 1975

In her thoughtful review of Black Paper 1975, Irena Holt explores the themes of social justice and education. She highlights the need for equity and fairness in educational systems, emphasizing the importance of addressing the needs of all students, particularly those from disadvantaged backgrounds.

Holt's analysis delves into the complexities of educational reform, critically assessing the proposals made in Black Paper 1975. She questions the feasibility of implementing such changes and discusses the potential challenges that educators and policymakers might face in putting these ideas into practice.

Through her review, Holt underscores the need for a systemic approach to education, where policies are developed with the aim of fostering a more inclusive and equitable society. She argues that education is not just about improving academic outcomes but also about empowering students to become active citizens.

In conclusion, Holt's review serves as a valuable contribution to the ongoing debate on education reform. It encourages readers to think critically about the implications of educational policies and to consider the broader social and political contexts in which education occurs.

Lunacy

The traditional rural order dominated with a minimal degree of social control. The working class in villages could not have done without the law, whether they liked it or not. The working class, though fit for a purpose, was left to cope with their own problems: the life of the land was managed by the working class. The Lunacy Act, which was passed in 1845, was a major step in the right direction. It provided for the admission of lunatics to asylum hospitals, and for the appointment of inspectors and medical officers. ABORTION: WHAT ARE THE CHOICES?

BY ROS GAINES

There's been a great deal of publicity around abortion recently, and probably not so much of it. The Abortion Amendement bill, introduced by Federal White, is likely to be the last such bill ever to come before this Parliament and is expected to be successful. CPSA confirms opposition to Social Contract

UNTIL very recently, the Civil and Public Services Association (CPSA) had supported the government's plan for a National Industrial Relations Service. However, the CPSA now opposes the Social Contract, which was proposed by the government. The CPSA's support for the National Industrial Relations Service was conditional, and the union now believes that the Social Contract is not in the interests of its members.

Worker Cards defeated

The CPSA has voted against the introduction of worker cards, which the government is planning to introduce to improve industrial relations. The CPSA believes that worker cards are not necessary and that they would be a step towards the establishment of a national industrial relations service.

Anonymous

Three resolutions were passed by the CPSA's annual conference in York. The resolutions call for a united front against the National Industrial Relations Service, and for the CPSA to work with other unions to oppose the Social Contract.

Lynching

The CPSA has called for an end to the practice of lynching, which is still prevalent in some parts of the country. The CPSA believes that lynching is a form of mob rule, and that it should be treated as a crime.

End private practice

The CPSA has called for an end to private practice, which it believes is a form of exploitation of workers. The CPSA believes that private practice is a form of industrial relations, and that it should be opposed by all unions and workers.
